

Thinking, Identity, and Biography

To me, the only thing that matters in any human expression is the value of ideas. Everything else is mere vanity. Whenever I read, write, or ponder over something, I recall the words of Georges Santayana: "Theory helps us to bear our ignorance of fact." (The Sense of Beauty - 1896).

In the field of ideas, I still think that science is the only thing capable of making philosophy go beyond supposition and rhetoric, and that philosophy is the only thing capable of making science go beyond fact and blindness. To the establishment of conflicts between both, I give the name of ignorance.

ROBERTO THOMAS ARRUDA, 83 years old, a Brazilian citizen, married, living in São Paulo, Brazil.

Retired corporate international lawyer, lifelong philosophy student, and independent researcher (mainly in social and philosophical fields); retired professor of philosophy of law, managerial systems, MBA programs, and several legal subjects at Brazilian universities. Co-founder, tenured professor, and member of the Board of Trustees of the Municipal University Authority of Poços de Caldas (Brazil). He served in several government entities and on various boards.

He is a member of:
The American Philosophical Association (APA).
The British Society for Ethical Theory (BSET).
The Metaphysical Society of America (MSA).
The Philosophical Society of England
The Social Psychology Network
The International Association of Language and Social Psychology
The Society for the Study of the History of Analytical Philosophy.

As an independent researcher, he conducted comprehensive studies of the content, forms, and trends in contemporary Western philosophical academia. His research examined the interactions and contributions of its practitioners, as well as the formation of groups and associations engaged in philosophical inquiry. The focus was on their involvement in developing pedagogical tools and processes that emerged in the digital age, and their influence on the future of philosophy (the academy in the face of distance learning, open resources, global access, and AI).
