Synopsis of Research

Trained as a philosopher -- with a specialization in ethics and political philosophy, in both the analytic and continental traditions – I use in my research philosophical methods of analysis to bring insight to problems and ideas emerging from discussions in applied and practical ethics in management and in its related fields. My research often involves conceptual, normative and cultural discussions. Instead of delving into pure, abstract meta-ethical philosophical issues, my research aims at providing philosophical insight into issues in applied ethics that arise in concrete human practices. Moreover, I aim that my research will be insightful to both researchers and practitioners working in management and business. In other words, I am a philosophical contextualist both in the scope of my research and in the methods of its application. Methodologically, my research makes use of several philosophical methods of discussion, including conceptual clarifications and critical and interpretative modes of discussion, in order to deal with ethical problems emerging predominantly from the human activities that constitute and inform the realms of business, organizational and professional life.

In contrast with some of my colleagues, my work is not aimed at expounding and justifying a particular ideological position. Arguing for a certain ideological and normative ethical position might be a worthy social task, but I do not think that it is within the scope of our academic prerogatives as reflective and critical philosophical researchers. Instead, I employ and evaluate theoretical and conceptual ethical methods of analysis used in reflections on these issues, in order to disclose underlying presuppositions and hidden ideological standpoints that promote conceptual and ethical edification. My goal in doing so is to provide a conceptual and normative clarification of the broader cultural meaning of ethical issues involved therein and the attempt to understand them by means of elaborated ethical explanations.

My research revolves around three main themes.

[1] Theoretical issues in business and organizational ethics: As a business ethicist, I have done research within the sub-disciplines of the field, including marketing ethics, organizational ethics, ethics in labor relations and ethical issues in corporate governance.

[2] Fundamental methodological issues: One of the two primary subjects in my current research is the fundamental methodological issues involved in the nature and methods of applied ethics.

[3] Research in professional ethics: The other primary subject in my current research is the area of professional ethics.

My work on methodological issues in applied and practical ethics stresses the concrete and human dimensions of applied ethics. My article, "Humanizing business through emotions: On the role of emotions in ethics" (Lurie, 2004) fleshes out the dual role of emotions and feelings, which allowing managers to sustain their humanity, even if, at times, this does not make for easier and more efficient ethical decision-making. In my research, I challenge attitudes towards applied ethics that align it with decision-making procedures and I seek to prove that decision-making requires prior ethical understanding (Lurie, 2007). I believe that the goal of ethical reasoning is not decision-making as such, but rather the development of edifying perspectives on what is involved in ethical reasoning. In my current research on "thick and thin ethical concepts," I demonstrate how applied ethics, by focusing on "thick" rather than "thin" ethical concepts, discloses the rich normative meaning of our social practices and social relations.

My research in professional ethics began with my studies on the ethics of competitive sports, specifically the unique professional ethics of sports doctors and coaches in our sports culture (2002). My research in professional ethics includes ongoing research on the ethics of software engineers (2016), as well as another research study (in progress) on the ethical problems related to the professional ethics of tour guides. Finally, my research in the field of professional ethics includes papers presented in both academic and professional conferences on the professional ethics of various occupations, such as, banking, dentistry, accountancy, and financial consulting. This is a very rich field for research because, while traditional professions seem to be losing ground in the struggle for professional status, semi-professions are aspiring to a higher professional status. Two primary themes in my research on professional ethics are the concept of professional autonomy and the dilemmas of professionals in administrative and managerial roles. My current research on these two related themes studies the notion of “professional authority” and the grounds of professional disobedience.
