PAPERS IN PROGRESS

- “The Practical Standpoint on Procreation”
I show that the non-identity problem is only a moral problem if we think of procreation as issuing in biological creatures, individuated by their unique genetics. If we look at procreation as an imputable action of persons that puts them in a practical relation to their offspring, then the moral relevance of the offspring's genetic identity falls away.

“Loving a Fetus with No Future”

I argue that an early fetus can have moral standing in virtue of its relation to other persons, whether or not it has independent moral status in virtue of its own properties. The relational account of moral standing helps explain why it's appropriate to mourn the loss of an early fetus in the event of a miscarriage, even though it's typically permissible to abort fetuses at that same stage.

“Moral Dilemmas”

I motivate Peter Winch's account of moral dilemmas in “The Universalizability of Moral Judgements,” and, in doing so, I show what the possibility of such cases reveals about morality's indeterminacy and our contribution as co-authors of morality's requirements.
