Dissertation Abstract

The Virtues of Intimate Relationships

Having good relationships with our intimates such as family members and friends is an important part of human flourishing. My dissertation aims to shed light on the importance and distinctive nature of intimate relationships by developing my own version of a virtue-ethical approach to this topic. For this purpose, I analyze ideal intimate relationships in terms of what I call “relational virtues,” which are virtues required for the participants of such relationships. The paradigmatic examples of relational virtue include filial piety (a good child’s virtue) and the virtue of friendship (a good friend’s virtue).

Many philosophers have attempted to capture the ethical value and normative significance of intimate relationships (at least ‘healthy’ ones) in terms of duty. I argue that the theories based on duty fail to capture appropriate inner attitudes that are partly constitutive of filial piety such as love and gratitude toward our parents. I then argue that the idea of a duty to love fails to capture the value and normative significance of our love for our loving parents (or ‘filial’ love) and show how a virtue-ethical approach can make better sense of it.

To improve on existing theories, I introduce the relational virtue approach to filial piety. First, a relational virtue involves a special attitude toward particular individuals, which is distinguished from love for humanity in general. Second, a relational virtue is reciprocal because its content may vary with the degree to which the other member is relationally virtuous. For example, the content of filial piety may vary with the virtuousness of the parents. Third, a relational virtue is dependent in the sense that its internal goal of engaging in a good intimate relationship cannot be achieved unless the other member is relationally virtuous as well. I proceed to show how my relational virtue view can explain some important features of filial piety suggested by Confucianism: filial piety in early childhood, the close relationship between self-cultivation and filial piety, and filial piety after parents’ decease. I then show how a relational approach to filial piety is distinguished from the traditional Confucian role-based approach.

Finally, I argue that the virtue of friendship understood as a relational virtue can make sense of the nature and value of ideal friendship. I focus on how my view of friendship differs from and improves the Aristotelian view. In particular, I argue that friendship as a relational virtue is distinguished from general virtues like benevolence or generosity. I also show how my relational view can help us better understand friendship by avoiding the sharp dichotomy between egoism and altruism.

There are two important differences between friendships and parent-child relationships: the former are more voluntarily chosen and non-hierarchical. Thus, by developing my account of relational virtue with respect to both examples, I show that the idea of relational virtue does not essentially involve either the presence or absence of choice or the presence or absence of hierarchy.
