DISSERTATION

Title: The Central Role of Cognition in Kant's Transcendental Deduction (link)

Committee: Allen W. Wood (chair), Gary Ebbs, Adam Leite, Paul Vincent Spade, Rebecca Spang (Department of History)

Short Abstract:

I argue that Kant's primary epistemological concern in the Critique of Pure Reason's transcendental deduction is empirical cognition. I show how empirical cognition is best understood as "rational sensory discrimination": the capacity to discriminate sensory objects through the use of concepts and with a sensitivity to the normativity of reasons. My dissertation focuses on Kant's starting assumption of the transcendental deduction, which I argue to be the thesis that we have empirical cognition. I then show how Kant's own subjective deduction fleshes out his conception of empirical cognition and is intertwined with key steps in the transcendental deduction's arguments that the categories have objective validity and that we have synthetic a priori cognition.

Longer Abstract:

The transcendental deduction of Kant's Critique of Pure Reason aims to establish that the categories—a priori concepts including "substance" and "cause and effect"—genuinely apply to objects of experience. I argue that Kant's under-investigated notion of empirical cognition is the transcendental deduction's central epistemological notion and that it refers primarily to "rational sensory discrimination". Kant's focus on empirical cognition is of interest insofar as more familiar epistemological concerns—e.g., about certainty or justification—are secondary to his distinctive task of explaining how it is possible for us to make rational sensory discriminations.

Chapter 1 traces the history, beginning with Descartes but continuing through Leibniz and Wolff, of the epistemological notions of clarity and distinctness. With this historical background, I argue in Chapter 2 that Kant conceives of empirical cognition as clear and discursively distinct representation: the identification or differentiation (whether correct or not) of objects of experience from each other, occurring through a capacity to become aware of and express normative reasons (whether good or not) for those identifications or differentiations. That is, empirical cognition is "rational sensory discrimination".

I show in Chapter 3 that the transcendental deduction's starting assumption is that we have empirical cognition in this sense. Although others have held that Kant assumes we have empirical cognition, I provide fuller evidence for this interpretation over its competitors and show how Kant understood Hume as likewise assuming we have empirical cognition.

Kant's argumentative strategy consists of two intertwined strands: (1) the objective deduction, which aims to show that the categories have objective validity; and, (2) the subjective deduction, whose purpose has been a matter of scholarly debate. I argue in Chapter 4 that the subjective deduction has two aims: elucidating the objective deduction's starting assumption in order to show how the understanding has a cognitive relation to objects, and preparing the reader for Kant's extension of his Copernican Revolution—the guiding thought that objects must conform to our cognition rather than the other way around—to the faculty of the understanding.

In Chapter 5, I present an account of the empirical side of the subjective deduction. I show that Kant's argument is that an empirical threefold synthesis, grounded on three empirical faculties of the mind, is required for a cognitive subject to represent normative reasons, which representations are shown to be necessary on my interpretation of empirical cognition.

Chapters 6, 7, and 8 concern the a priori side of the subjective deduction, namely why Kant thinks that—in addition to the a priori faculty of sensibility investigated in the Transcendental Aesthetic—two additional a priori faculties make possible the empirical threefold synthesis: transcendental apperception and pure imagination. And as I argue in those chapters, Kant's arguments for each of these a priori faculties are not only shared by the subjective and objective deductions, but are also central to the Transcendental Deduction chapter of both editions of the first Critique.

Chapter 6 concerns transcendental apperception, which guarantees the possibility of a cognitive subject's a priori self-consciousness of her own numerical identity as a cognitive subject. I argue that Kant holds transcendental apperception to be necessary for empirical cognition insofar as a cognitive subject must be sensitive to the normativity of concepts used in her empirical cognition. I conclude this chapter by sketching how this argument for transcendental apperception sets up the objective deduction's attempted demonstration of the categories' objective validity.

In Chapter 7, I present the A-edition's argument that a faculty of pure imagination is necessary for empirical cognition. This argument is of great importance because it also shows that the understanding uses the categories to legislate a priori laws of nature. Nevertheless, the A-edition's argument suffers from a crucial flaw.

Accordingly, I show in Chapter 8 how the B-edition's argument attempts to avoid the aforementioned flaw. In explaining this new argument, I thereby offer a new answer to Dieter Henrich's famous "problem of the two-steps-in-one-proof", viz., the oddity that the B-edition's argument contains two steps, the second of which seems to be redundant. I argue that the solution to this problem lies in recognizing that whereas the first step attempts to establish that the categories have objective validity insofar as any appearance directly given and cognized by us must stand under them, the second step appeals to our formal intuitions of space and time in order to show that all appearances—even those that are not directly presented to our senses—must stand under the categories. Kant attempts to achieve the latter by showing that, insofar as all appearances are in space and time, and insofar as space and time are apperceived as "formal intuitions", all appearances must be subject to a priori laws of nature legislated by our faculty of understanding.
