Abstract:

My dissertation articulates what I term the "colonial contract" and demonstrates the contributions of decolonial feminism to social and political philosophy. I argue that the colonial imaginary of the colonial contract and its intersection with what Charles Mills and Carol Pateman respectively identify as the racial and sexual contracts have yet to be adequately theorized by social and political philosophers. I develop an account of the colonial contract from the standpoint of decolonial feminism emerging from the U.S. Latinx context in order to examine the simultaneous formation of the categories of gender and race through the processes of colonization and the coloniality of power. I contend that dismantling the colonial contract requires decolonial imaginaries that open up alternative strategies for forging coalitional politics capable of tackling problems specific to marginalized and oppressed communities.
