Impact of research outside academia

My arguments for a pluralist egalitarian view of distributive justice have shaped a landmark report by the World Health Organization's (WHO) Consultative Group on Equity and Universal Health Coverage (on which I served 2012-2014), marking a departure from a previous focus on cost-effectiveness. The report's principles have been endorsed in full by the WHO Director-General and have shaped WHO guidance to member states. They have been adopted by public actors to guide health resource allocation in many countries, notably in Latin America, Norway, and Ethiopia. They have been used by international actors and professional organisations to evaluate interventions. They are also the guiding principles of a five-year, £5m training and priority-setting programme in Ethiopia and Zanzibar. This policy impact is the basis of one of my Department's Impact Case Studies for the UK Research Excellence Framework 2021. I was also asked to contribute to a background paper for the WHO/OECD's report on how to evaluate social and movement measures during the pandemic. Finally, since 2019 I have been an expert consultant on a World Bank/Norwegian Institute of Public Health programme of work on Fair Health Financing.

Mean score in seminar evaluations in 2014-2018 ('How satisfied have you been with the class teaching on this course?' 1=very good; 5=poor): 1.2.

Mean score in seminar evaluations in 2018-21 ('Overall, I am satisfied with the seminar teaching by this lecturer on this course', 5=definitely agree and 1=definitely disagree): 4.8. Teaching Excellence Award in 2012, 2017, and 2018, and was short-listed in 2016.

I have developed three new degrees at LSE: the MSc Philosophy and Public Policy; the BSc Politics and Philosophy; and the BSc Philosophy, Politics and Economics. Each degree is highly successful and attracts high ratios of students per place; together they have around 300 students enrolled at any time at LSE. I have also worked with others to create three philosophy courses at the request of other departments: Business and Organizational Ethics (at BSc and MSc level, at the request of the Department of Management); Philosophy for Public Policy (at the request of the School of Public Policy); and Philosophy and Public Policy (for Behavioural Science). Together, these courses and degrees have expanded teaching staff in my department by around 7 FTE (nearly doubling its size), and across the rest of the LSE by around another 6 FTE.
