Philosophy

Dissertation: The temporal dimension of justice

In the context of historical injustices against indigenous peoples and climate change, I argue that a revised version of the supersession thesis can explain what reasons we have for redressing historical injustices and also clarify how strong these reasons are. In particular, I contend that a revised version of this thesis gives rise to a general principle able to accommodate both the compensatory and distributive aspects of justice.

Dissertation: Responsabilidad Penal Intergeneracional (Intergenerational Criminal Responsibility)

The thesis argues that criminal prohibitions intending to protect future people can be justified in the lights of the harm principle. Moreover, I explain how a version of the “disjunctive conception of harming” can be used to solve a variety of problems in the general part of the criminal law.

Thesis: La justificación de la protección de las generaciones futuras a través del derecho penal (The justification of the protection of future generations through Criminal Law).

The thesis argues that there are harm-based reasons that justify criminal prohibitions in order to protect future people even in non-identity cases, that is, even in those cases in which the action that causes someone to suffer harm is a necessary condition of this person’s existence.

MOST IMPORTANT RESEARCH RESULTS

Practical Philosophy

In one chapter of my dissertation in Philosophy, I showed that the legal doctrines of unjust enrichment and the law of restitution are plausible candidates for serving as the basis for justified principles for the global distribution of climate mitigation duties. Some findings on how some issues concerning the law of restitution are to be applied in climate justice appeared in the paper published in MoPP (see below). I also conducted one of the first explorations on the relationship between the supersession thesis, climate change, and the rights of future people. These findings appeared in the paper published in CRISPP (see below).

Political Theory In one chapter of my dissertation in Philosophy, by considering indigenous claims in Argentina, I showed that although the claimants for collective demands for reparation have to be members of groups that, having suffered historical injustices, have survived into the present, they do not need to belong to the same groups who suffered past injustice. These findings appeared in the paper published in the EJPT (see below).

Legal Theory In my dissertation in Law, I conducted the first exploration in Spanish of the implications of the non-identity problem to issues in criminal law. Moreover, I explained how a version of the “disjunctive conception of harming” introduced by Lukas Meyer in 2003 can be used to solve a variety of problems in the general part of the criminal law. These findings appeared in the paper published in Política Criminal (see below).

| | | We argue that legitimate expectations should be taken into account in transitional processes. We show that not all legitimate expectations have the same normative weight.  DOI: <https://doi.org/10.14198/DOXA2023.47.7>
 47:163-182
 This paper shows that even if all people involved in some historical injustices are dead, that fact is insufficient for asserting that such injustice is superseded. In particular, I show that descendants of direct victims of historical injustices can be considered negatively affected by their lasting impacts. I also argue that the passage of time can reduce the duty to provide compensation

 After the Conquest of the Desert, the State of Argentina forcibly imposed its institutional system over the surviving members of several indigenous communities. This is an historical injustice that, at that time, required the reversion of the indigenous institutions. I argue that, owed to changing circumstances, these claims have less normative force than they had in the past. However, I propose three reforms so that the application of the Argentinian institutional system over indigenous people will be legitimate.

 The article defends a version of the threshold notion of harm as a plausible solution to non-identity problem as superior to other three possible proposals.

I show that the harm principle (intergenerational and international) is able to provide good reasons in favor of the moral justification of the criminalization of posthericide.

In this work, I present some considerations on the strength of the reasons against harming. I distinguish between different kinds of harmed states and harming actions. I explain which kind of harmed state is worse, and which kind of harming action provides stronger reasons against harming

In this paper I tried to find a harm based solution to the non-identity problem. I explore the view upon which future persons are harmed if we prevent them from having what it is required by the Principle of Utility.
- Política Criminal: Revista Electrónica Semestral de Políticas Públicas en Materias Penales* 2017 Un concepto de daño y sus consecuencias para la parte general del derecho penal (A concept of harm and its consequences for the general part of criminal law)

12(24)14: 1184-1210
I show how my account of harm help in solving three problems of the general part of criminal law. I show that it helps to solve cases of hypothetical causal courses, to distinguish between cases of necessity as justification and necessity as excuse, and it also supplies criteria to measure punishment
- Daimon: Revista Internacional de Filosofía* 2017 ¿Puede el no-comparativismo resolver el problema de la no-identidad? (Could non-comparativist views solve the Non-Identity Problem?)
DOI: <http://dx.doi.org/10.6018/daimon/225241>
70:83-96
I explore non-comparative accounts of harm and assess whether they can solve the non-identity problem. In this paper, I show that non-comparative accounts of harm cannot fully solve it. For that reason I begin to develop a combined theory.
- Revista Latinoamericana de Filosofía Política (RLFP)* 2016 El peso de los daños: estados de daño y razones para no dañar (The weight of harm: harmed states and reasons against harming)
<http://rlfp.org.ar/el-peso-de-los-danos/>
V (4):1-25
I start with my analysis o the meaning of harm as well as the strength of the reasons against harming. I argue that there are two kinds of harms: absolute and relative. I argue that when certain harm has been completely covered by considering such harm as absolute, the consideration of such harm as –also– relative is displaced.

<http://www.derecho.uba.ar/publicaciones/lye/revistas/97/estado-de-necesidad-y-dano.pdf>
97:271-293
Necessity as justification takes place when the evil that has been avoided is greater than the evil that has been caused. Necessity as excuse takes place when this fact does not occur. In this paper, I will argue that: (a) even if the legal good that has been harmed has an equal rank to the legal good that has been defended, and (b) even if the degree of harm would be –in a sense– equal; it is possible that necessity as a justification should be applied rather than as an excuse.

Co-authored with Hugo Seleme, Romina Rekers, Ramiro Moyano, Florencia Rodriguez and Francisco Di Santo.
We argue that preventive-collective habeas corpus is a suitable legal tool for dealing with threats to freedom of movement in those cases in which security policies are grounded on fear and are specially addressed to an specific sector of society, We argue that a liberal interpretation of the Argentinian legal Sistema requires a wide interpretation of who has legal standing for initiating this legal action in Courts.

I explore the relation between harm and the non-identity problem. I defend the no harm account can fully solve the non-identity problem. However, I defend that a reformulation of the counterfactual comparative account is superior, and should be endorsed.

<https://revistas.unc.edu.ar/index.php/refade/article/view/23724>
VI (2):193-214
In this paper I analyze the harm principle in the Argentinian legal system. I use a real case to assess the court's arguments in order to determine whether they are consistent with the Argentinian constitutional law.
- Revista General de Derecho Penal (IUSTEL)* 2013 Feuerbach y la Libertad: el objetivo del derecho penal liberal (Feuerbach and Freedom: the aim of liberal criminal law)
http://www.iustel.com/v2/revistas/detalle_revista.asp?id_noticia=413149&texto=%20 19:1-21
I explore Feuerbach's thinking. I explain how his view about freedom can be used for defending a republican reading of the criminal law compatible with some versions of liberalism.

http://www.palermo.edu/derecho/pdf/DA_N3_02.pdf
2(2):59-98.
Criminal prohibitions in liberal systems are justified either by employing the harm principle or the notion of legal good. So far, such criteria have failed in justifying the prohibition of environmental accumulative crimes. I argue that these problems stem from mistakes at the moment of thinking about accumulative harms.

I argue that the exclusive use of hypothetical examples to assess the normative significance of historical injustices is risky. By being abstract generalizations, hypothetical examples seem not to permit a critical reflection on the role of history and how it might affect possible solutions of conflicting interests in the present.
